

Herzog & de Meuron's interiors for 56 Leonard "Jenga" tower revealed

Dan Howarth | 6 April 2017 | 26 comments

These images offer a peek at amenity spaces available to residents moving into Herzog & de Meuron's recently completed skyscraper in Tribeca, New York.

The private facilities, also designed by the Swiss architects, span 17,000 square feet (1,5880 square metres) across the ninth and 10th floors of the 60-storey building at 56 Leonard Street.

Top interiors stories

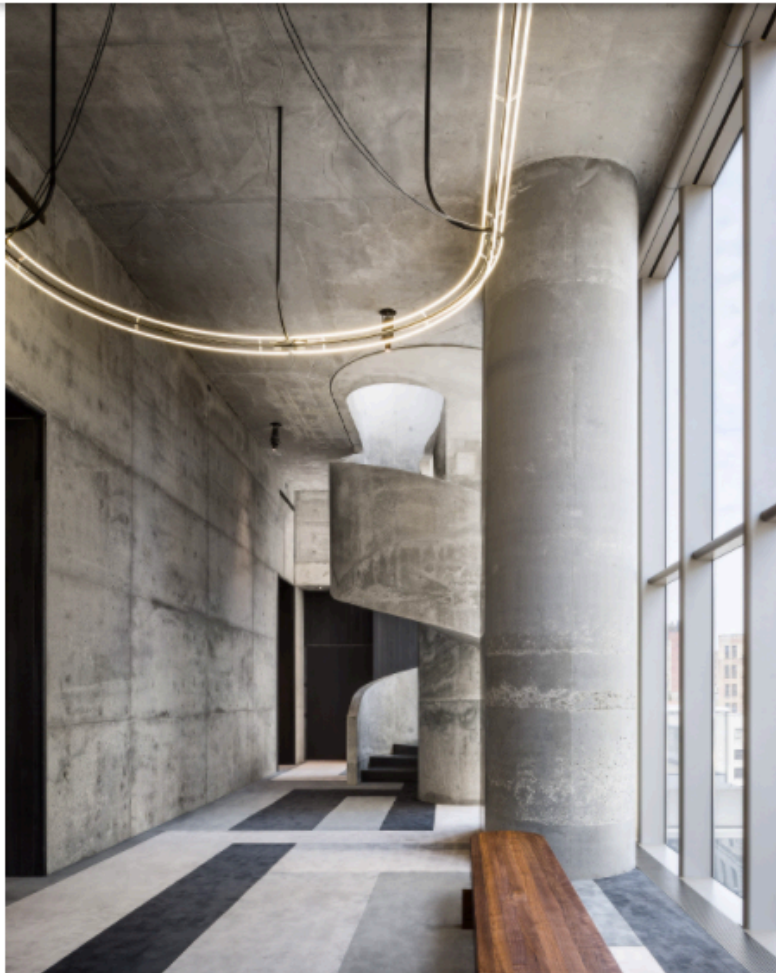

Most popular

Most recent

1 Studio Tack overhauls mid-century motel to create Anvil Hotel in Wyoming

2 Curtains separate spaces in Lisbon offices for a "hook-up app"

Concrete is used predominantly across the two levels, which are connected up a

- 3 Shades of grey decorate sombre luxury apartment in Taiwan
- 4 "Joyful chaos" inspires design of Yafo hummus deli in Paris
- 5 Cereal magazine unveils alternative show flat on London's Greenwich Peninsula

Black corrugated metal encases loft-inspired interiors of Japanese house by TakaTina

Herzog & de Meuron's Jenga-like skyscraper photographed by Hufton + Crow sculptural circular staircase also made from the material.

The double-height spaces are supported by thick cylindrical columns, with thin lengths of LED lighting suspended in loops from the ceilings.

A 75-foot (23-metre) swimming pool is located in a room where the walls, columns and ceiling beams are covered in tiny metallic tiles. It looks onto a terrace and hot tub

Muji to sell tiny blackened timber huts for £21,000

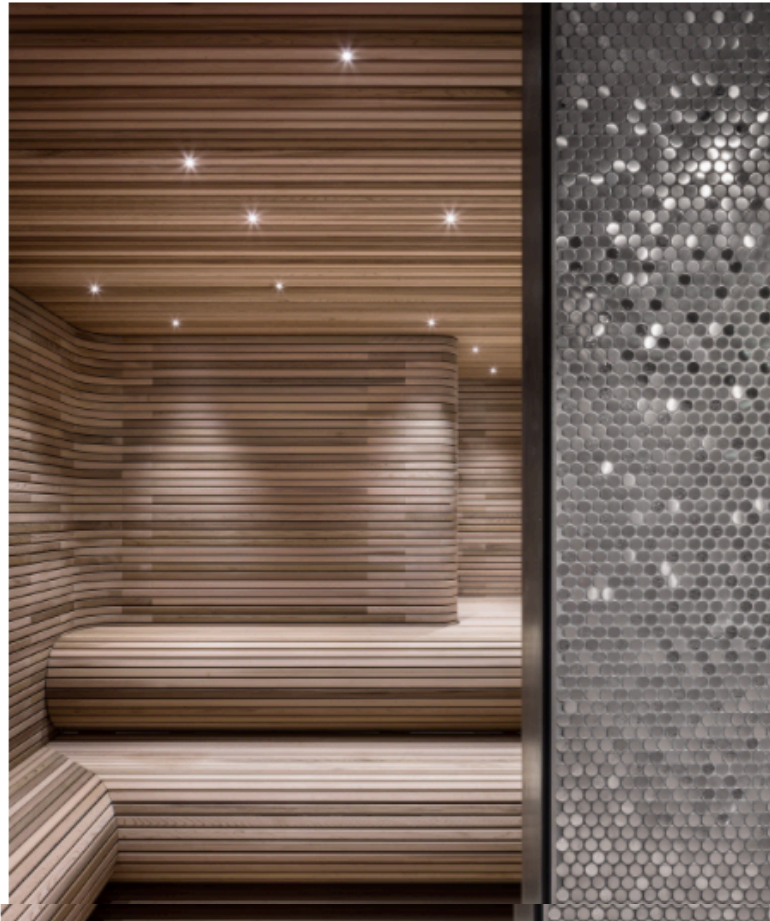

McLaren Excell contrasts smoked oak with white panelling in renovated London offices through floor-to-ceiling glazing, which also offers views across Manhattan.

Other facilities include a fitness centre with a yoga studio, and a steam room lined with thin horizontal strips of wood that curves around corners.

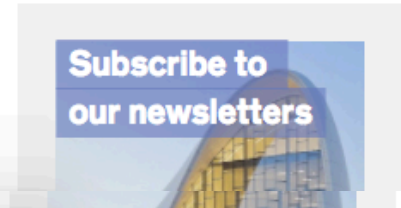

Coffey Architects sets small brick home atop Victorian prison vaults in London

Subscribe

Subscribe to our newsletters

Leather seats fill the internal portion of an indoor/outdoor theatre, which features black walls and a metal-mesh ceiling, along with a glass front that opens onto a balcony.

A library lounge, a private dining salon, a catering kitchen, a conference centre and a children's play area are also all available for residents to use.

Work on the skyscraper completed earlier this year. Its stacked form, which houses 145 residences, has resulted in comparisons to wooden block game Jenga.

Email

Sign me up!

Carl Hansen & Son builds faux apartment to explore how furniture makes a home

Dekleva Gregorič Arhitekti tops Chimney House with long skylight

The tower is topped with 10 penthouses, while one corner of the ground level appears to be supported by a bulbous mirrored sculpture by artist Anish Kapoor.

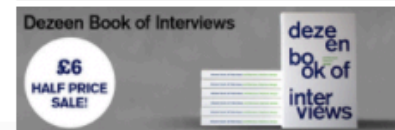

Construction began in 2008 but stopped soon after, when its developer Alexico Group failed to raise the last portion of the project's financing. However it resumed in 2012, and the project topped out in 2015.

Earlier this year, photography duo Hufton + Crow captured the tower to show the context of its relatively low-rise surroundings.

Photography is by Alexander Severin.

Kengo Kuma's major expansion of Portland Japanese Garden opens

<https://www.dezeen.com/2017/04/06/herzog-de-meuron-56-leonard-jenga-tower-tribeca-new-york-interiors-amenity-spaces-swimming-pool/>